There are a few canny ones who can black and of the simplest draped sense this thing, but they are very few and far between. The others stand around and fear that, before long, we may all be dressing in Spanish regalia or trailing our skirts along the streets. Usually there happens a happy medium which is quite thoroughly satisfactory to all concerned, and which does not revolutionize the ways of dress so completely as may have been predicted. So with two modes which are afterthe-season creations fresh from Paris, They are about as unstartling as any two fashions could be, and, on the other hand, they are just about as smart as could be hoped for. After all, it is simplicity that counts in the long run. The French always come back to that standard, no matter what may be their little excursions into the space of a more cluttered era.

The lines are longer, to be sure, but they are simply and quietly lengthened, with every attention given to proportion and the blending of one line with another, until there results that harmony which is always satisfying and which, authoritatively handled, is becoming to whatever figure happens to wear it.

Bodies That Are Simple. A cable from Paris, about the opening of the collection of Madeleine Vionet, says that all of her models are as simple as can be, and that they follow rather closely the lines laid down by her last season.
